

Field Report: Concerning Tamsin Greyfen and the Gauntlet of Sorrowfell

Filed under: Ashen Era personnel and regalia Condition of record: Incomplete; witness confidence divided

I submit this report for those who prefer a clean account, though clean accounts are scarce in the Ashen Era. The name Tamsin Greyfen appears in the field rolls as a minor figure, her trade marked plainly: Sapper. No rank beyond that is preserved here. No allegiance is safely attached to her name in the supplied record. Those who claim to have known her speak with the confidence of people remembering someone else.

The register gives her birth without ornament: Tamsin Greyfen - born: 393 AS.

No canonical physical details are recorded for Tamsin Greyfen. Any description of her face, stature, scars, hair, clothing, or manner of bearing must therefore be treated as camp invention, and camp invention is often more durable than iron. Her visual identity is associated with the work of a sapper: the measured hand, the patient suspicion of walls, the knowledge that a quiet place may be waiting to become a loud one. I do not certify these as personal traits. They belong to the craft, not necessarily to the woman.

Her demeanor is likewise unrecorded. It cannot honestly be called grim, kind, fearful, devout, or bold. The absence of such marks has been mistaken by some for secrecy. It may be secrecy. It may only be an empty margin.

The second subject of this report is the Gauntlet of Sorrowfell. It is regalia, though no account supplied here fixes its forging date. Its visual identity is that of regalia bearing the name Gauntlet of Sorrowfell. Let no sketchmaster improve upon this. The record gives no sanctioned ornament, material, coloration, size, or hand for it.

Its attunement cost is 12.

That figure is not a recommendation, a tally of victims, or a measure of worth. It is the recorded cost of attunement, and nothing more. The artifact carries an atmosphere of sorrow and grim authority. Whether this quality rises from enchantment, history, or the fear of those who behold it remains unresolved. I have seen men bow before empty armor and call the bow wisdom.

No supplied fact establishes that Tamsin Greyfen bore, wore, handled, sought, guarded, or opposed the Gauntlet of Sorrowfell. Their names are placed together in this report because the order demands their examination together—not because the truth grants us that convenience.

Further claims should be entered as rumor until corroborated.