Person	Cerys Sablewood the Ashen	Major Master of Coin	Born in 330 AS	Present in controlled calculation; inheritance concealed, not thereby erased.

Entry of the Ward

The Thrice-Bound Lantern is a ward forged in 72 AS. Its threefold binding is not ornament, nor the boast of a maker seeking a brighter shine. It defines the object: protection through restraint, safety through containment, and danger held where danger may do no further harm.

The lantern bears three visible bindings. They cross its body with the severity of fetters, and give it a warding silhouette fit to discourage both curiosity and courage. No softness is entered in its description. Its shape declares that it was made to hold fast.

Its demeanor is one of guarded stillness. It radiates as though perpetually holding danger at bay. Those who mistake silence for weakness may learn otherwise, though this roll records no such lesson and will not furnish one for free.

Muster judgment: serviceable as a protective object. Do not loosen, break, or test the bindings for amusement. Containment is its purpose, and restraint is the measure of its strength.

Entry of the Person

Cerys Sablewood the Ashen is a major Master of Coin, born in 330 AS. The title is entered without embellishment: a Master of Coin must weigh what others spend, conceal what others seek, and know the cost of every promise that arrives without a price written upon it.

The record further states that Cerys Sablewood the Ashen is the unacknowledged heir to the Bleeding Crown. This is not entered as gossip, though gossip often survives where truth is ordered to kneel. It is entered as a concealed royal inheritance carried beneath the discipline of office.

No canonical physical features are established for Cerys Sablewood the Ashen. Let no clerk invent a face, a stature, or a scar to make the account more pleasing. The epithet “the Ashen” provides Cerys’s defining visual identity and is sufficient for this roll.

The demeanor observed is controlled and calculating, as expected of a major Master of Coin carrying a hidden royal inheritance. The countenance is not described; the atmosphere is. It is the atmosphere of figures balanced too carefully to be accidental.

Muster judgment: present, watchful, and not to be mistaken for unburdened.
